Retailers urged to step up crowd Wal-Mart death spurs public-safety proposals

Retailers luring shoppers with deep discounts should have at least one security guard for every 200 shoppers, erect barricaded corrals 100 feet from entrances and consider other crowd control measures to prevent a repeat of this year's "Black Friday" tragedy, a top police official said.

Inspector Thomas Krumpter offered the proposals yesterday at a hearing of the Nassau County Legislature's public safety committee - the first legislative review since the Nov. 28 trampling death of a Wal-Mart worker.

Jdimytai Damour, a temporary employee, had been on the job for about a week and had no training in security or crowd control, according to a lawyer for his relatives. The 34-year-old Queens man died of asphyxiation when a crowd estimated at 2,000 broke down the Valley Stream store's doors, trapping him in a vestibule, homicide detectives said.

County legislator Joseph Scannell said lawmakers have not submitted specific legislation but will consider all proposals aimed at preventing another tragedy. "We want to gather information, we want to listen, we want to learn," said Scannell.

A company spokesman said after yesterday's hearing that Wal-Mart was committed to stronger safety measures. "We stand ready to work with elected officials as they consider their proposals," said Steven V. Restivo, director of corporate affairs for the store's northeast region.

Krumpter said police will discuss security proposals Monday with major retailers in the suburban county outside New York City. Retailers, he said, "have been receptive to working with us."

He declined to discuss specifics of Damour's death, citing an ongoing criminal investigation and lawsuits. Police Commissioner Lawrence Mulvey has previously said he believes the store lacked adequate crowd security.

Investigators said they believe the crowd had remained orderly until moments before the 5 a.m. store opening, when shoppers who'd been staying warm in their cars began to aggressively cut into the line. The crowd surge eventually broke down the store's front doors.

Detectives are continuing to review security video.

A number of lawsuits are already in the works, including one filed by Damour's family. An attorney for two injured shoppers said Wednesday that he has asked Attorney General Andrew Cuomo to take over the investigation because Nassau County and its police department are being named as defendants in some of the litigation.

"They simply cannot wear the hat of defendant and simultaneously, wear the hat of an investigating body," attorney Bruce Baron wrote. A spokesman for Cuomo said, "We will review the letter." A Nassau police spokesman declined comment.
